I woke up surrounded by an oppressive fog. It obscured my vision and hindered my breathing. I couldn't remember where I was or how I had gotten there. It was eerily quiet.

Until it wasn't.

The silence stopped. All around me, I could hear mechanical whirring and sputtering. The echoes and shadows of voices broke through my muted musings. My brain was having trouble processing. I felt blindsided by the sudden onslaught of sensory overload and was lost in a hazy version of my own reality.

Then, suddenly, the fog started to lift, and the vision cleared. I was in a room, attached by long strings of wire to more beeping, sputtering machines than I had ever seen in my life. People dressed in white and blue and green and pink formed around the corners of my eyes. They were talking to one another, though I could feel the urgency of their forced movements.

I remembered.

Reaching down to turn on the radio, looking up at Paul, then headlights streaming through the passenger-side window. Screaming brakes. Crunching metal. And nothing. "Paul," I managed to breathe through parched lips. The unexpected sound forced the dentures to a halt. "Paul," I said even louder, though I still couldn't have been more than a whisper.

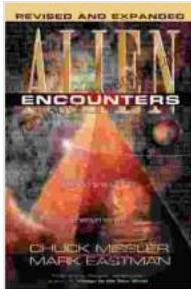

"He's gone. Your friend will be fine," someone responded. He was alive. And I was alive. And nothing of us would ever be the same.
