'Early Cold War Armor in Central Europe: New Vanguard' is a groundbreaking book that delves into the captivating history of tank warfare in this region during the early years of the Cold War. Written by renowned military historian Steven J. Zaloga, this comprehensive volume offers a detailed examination of the armored forces deployed by the Soviet Union, the United States, and their respective allies, providing a unique perspective on the strategies and tactics employed by each side.

Zaloga's meticulously researched work draws upon a wealth of primary sources, including official documents, memoirs, and interviews with veterans, to provide an in-depth analysis of the evolution of armored warfare in Central Europe. The book features over 200 rare and unpublished photographs, as well as detailed color plates and maps, bringing to life the deployment and combat operations of these powerful machines.

Through a chronological narrative, 'Early Cold War Armor in Central Europe' traces the development of armored formations within the Soviet and American armies, exploring the doctrinal and technological changes that shaped their respective approaches to tank warfare. Zaloga provides a comprehensive overview of the key armored vehicles deployed by both sides, including the Soviet T-54/55, the American M47 Patton, and the British Centurion, analyzing their strengths and weaknesses in the context of the Central European theater.

The book also examines the role of armored forces in key events and exercises during this period, such as the Berlin Crisis of 1958 and the REFORGER (Return of Forces to Germany) exercises conducted by NATO. Zaloga's analysis provides valuable insights into the strategic and operational thinking of the opposing forces, as well as the challenges and opportunities they faced in preparing for potential conflict.
